manner has outside of a certain environment; lawrence Rising had devised an ingenious ladder by which the two could make this artistic climb. Margaret Mayo, who alone was mentioned by the dark eyed Dolly—who did not talk through her nose—in her speech of gratitude, had supplied all the suggested indelicacy which Mr. Rising's imagination had overlooked. So there was everything in the play to exhilar the fatigued spectator looking for something more than diversion.

The author of "Twin Beda" had taken a leaf out of the book of Mr. Hopwood, who wrote "Fair and Warmer." So while there was nothing really in "His Bridal Night" which ought not to have been there no end of suggestion and innuendo deceived the spectators into the bellef that after all there might later be something altogether shocking.

Further reinforcements of ushers kept up the good work Laboriously the heavy weight of blossoms, funercal in their impressiveness, overwhelming in the suggestion of what they must have cost, were, by way of the middle assle, delivered to the two shrinking artists, the Sisters Dolly.

And the spectators, after the second act. When this handsome horticultural demonstration tribute was in transitty applauded with undentable enthusiasm. It was evident that they realized how much the two sisters deserved all this claborate recognition. For they had been silent for at least ten minutes before the curtain fell on the second act.

They had danced in their skilful and word. No wonder the audience, for the first time during the evening, liked the seen.
